

The Lie We Inherited About Strength

Five short sections to name what you learned about struggle, what you're actually carrying, and one real move toward saying it out loud.

NAME

PERSON TO TELL

1 The Inherited Story

- Name the messages you got about struggle — "figure it out", "don't be a burden", "real men don't".
- Trace one back to its source — a parent, a room, a specific moment it landed.
- Write one belief about strength you inherited that you now suspect was wrong.

ORIGIN TRACE

2 The Hidden Weight You're Carrying

- Finish this: "I'm fine" — except about _____. No one else reads this.
- Mark how long you've carried it alone — days, months, years.
- Name the cost of that silence — sleep, patience, presence, a relationship.

FOR EYES ONLY

3 The Double Standard Audit

- Would you tell a close friend to just push through what you're carrying? Write the honest answer.
- You'd hire a trainer without shame. Name one mental area where support makes the same logic.
- Name the real reason you haven't sought it — fear, cost, or not knowing how.

REAL REASON

4 Making Space — For Yourself and Others

- Think of someone who seems "off" lately. Write one low-pressure way to check on them this week.
- Recall a moment someone made space for you. What did they actually do that felt safe?
- Draft one honest sentence you could say to start that conversation with someone you trust.

DRAFT SENTENCE

5 Your Next Small Act

- Pick one concrete act for the next 7 days — reach out, book a consult, journal, or say "I'm not okay" once.
- Name the specific person you could tell the truth to this week.
- Finish it: "Real strength, for me, now looks like _____."
