

Your Own Data Is the Framework

Seven days of honest morning output that tells you more than three hours of borrowed advice ever could.

1 The Consumption Audit

- List every self-improvement input you consumed last week — podcast, newsletter, YouTube, book. Titles. Approximate time. Be specific.
- Next to each item, write one concrete thing you did differently because of it. If nothing changed, write nothing — that's the data.
- Calculate your ratio: hours consuming vs. hours doing. What does that number tell you about where your week actually went?

HONEST COUNT

2 Your Three-Line Morning Practice

- Before you open your phone for 7 days, write three lines: what you're worried about today, what you want to accomplish, and one honest sentence about how you're feeling. Two-minute timer. No editing.
- After Day 3, read back every entry. What surprised you? What keeps showing up that you didn't consciously notice?
- Where in your morning can this realistically live — what happens right before it, and what would you be trading away? Name the trade.

DAY 3 READ-BACK

3 Finding the Pattern in Your Own Data

- Look at the last 30 days. Write 3–5 specific moments when you felt genuinely good about your work or your day — not generally satisfied, specifically good.
- What do those moments have in common? Are you building something, analyzing something, connecting, moving? Name the verb.
- What decision have you been trying to figure out through content — that your own daily experience might already be answering? Write it plainly.

THE COMMON THREAD

4 The Belief You're Carrying

- Complete this sentence with the first honest thing that comes out: "I consume self-improvement content because I believe ____." Don't edit it.
- If you genuinely believed you already knew enough to take the next step — what would you do with your time this week? Write it as a specific action, not a feeling.
- Write one thing your past self from six months ago would call you out on right now — the way the author was called out by his own journal entry.
