

THE WEIGHT NOBODY MEASURES

There's another kind of exhaustion — and it doesn't show up anywhere.

The Weight Nobody Sees

Not burnout from doing too much

Exhaustion from holding too much

No metric captures it

The Cognitive Tax

Unresolved things run background processes

Zeigarnik effect: the mind holds incomplete loops

Emotional weight draws from the same pool as work

What It Looks Like

*“You’re not being lazy.
You’re running something heavy in the background.”*

Rereading the same paragraph three times

Decisions feel heavier than they should

Forty minutes pass with nothing to show

It Doesn't Stay Invisible

Leaks into relationships without warning

The half-second delay before warmth

“Silence has a texture people can feel.”

Why We Keep Carrying

Putting it down means looking at it first

The weight becomes familiar — even safe

Letting go can feel like betrayal

The First Move

Not a framework. Not a breakthrough.

Name it accurately — even only to yourself

The loop needs attention, not resolution

A series of horizontal lines for writing, with a diagonal line crossing them from top-right to bottom-left.

Stop Calling It Nothing

*“You are not as good at hiding it as you think.
And even if you were — you deserve to put it down.”*