

The Slow Fade Worksheet

Find the friendship you've let go quiet, see the exact moment it started, and write the one text that actually revives it.

NAME

DATE

PERSON'S NAME

1 Check Your Silent Ledger

- Name three people you've quietly decided "should reach out first." What's the unspoken math — why their turn, not yours?
- When did you start treating your outreach as spending and theirs as earning? Date it, even roughly.
- Which friendship are you explaining away with "life's just hectic" when the truer story is you stopped paying into it?
- Add up the balance today — who owes whom? Does that framing even survive being said out loud?

WHO'S ON THE LEDGER

2 Find Your "Next Sunday"

- Name a standing ritual you have or had — a weekly call, a lunch, a running joke — and who it was with.
- Recall the first "swamped this week, let's do it next [day]". What was the real reason, versus the excuse?
- What happened the second time it slipped — did either of you name it, or did the silence just get accepted?
- Pinpoint the moment it became interruptible. What was happening in your life right then?

THE RITUAL THAT SLIPPED

3 Depth vs. Frequency Autopsy

- Name one friendship you assumed could survive six months of silence because it was "real." Has it survived — or quietly expired?
- Name one relationship kept alive by pure frequency — a dumb voice note, a meme, a Tuesday text. What's the small habit that does it?
- Which friendship are you protecting on "depth alone will hold it" — and which one is most at risk of that belief being wrong?

DEPTH VS. FREQUENCY TALLY

4 Send the Specific-Memory Text

- Pick the one person you suspect is in a slow fade right now.
- Write the hyper-specific memory only the two of you would recognize — not "we should catch up," the exact bug, trip, or joke.
- Draft the actual text: the memory opener, or the direct line — "I feel like we've drifted, and I don't want to. Can we get on a call this week?" Which fits, and why?
- Name the real fear under not sending it. Then pick the day this week you'll send it — right now.

YOUR TEXT, DRAFTED