

The Anti-Gut Decision Worksheet

Four drills to catch your gut lying to you — before the panicked version of you has to make the call alone.

NAME

DATE

DECISION ON THE TABLE

1 Size of the Number vs. Shape of the Work

- Name the decision in front of you. What is your gut reacting to — the number, the title, the applause — separate from the actual work?
- Write the honest reasons for each option on paper. Does the growth you want already live where you are, dressed up as something you'd leave to get?
- Strip the flashy label. Would you still choose it for the work itself?
- Name one past decision where your gut read the number, not the work. What did it cost you?

GUT VS. WORK NOTES

2 Build Your Scored Rubric

- Pick one recurring decision — hiring, dating, buying, choosing projects. Write 4–5 criteria that predict success, not charisma.
- Weight each criterion. Set a hard cutoff number, the way 75 was the line.
- Recall a time instinct beat evidence on a decision like this. Run the math — what did it cost in time, money, energy?
- Who or what in your life is sharp in the interview but scores low if you graded it honestly?

RUBRIC DRAFT

3 Write Your Pre-Mortem

- Name one situation you know will spike your adrenaline in the next few months.
- While you're calm, write the decision you want the panicked version of you to execute when it happens.
- Where has "just slow down" failed you before? Be specific about the last time it didn't work.
- Write your own one-line operating principle — your version of hope for the best, prepare for the worst.

PRE-MORTEM PLAN

4 The Wrongness Question

- Take a decision you feel certain about today. Write down what you'd have to see to know you're wrong.
- Go look for that evidence now, before reality forces the question. What did you find?
- Think of the leaked-data churn model — looked brilliant until it wasn't. What corner are you cutting because it "feels" done?
- Is your certainty coming from evidence, or from wanting the work to already be finished?

EVIDENCE CHECK